PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT

The petitioner Matthew Madonna respectfully prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirming the judgment of conviction entered against the petitioner by the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Opinions Below

The Court of Appeals did not render an opinion but delivered a statement that appears in the Appendix hereto at pp. 1a-4a. No opinion was rendered by the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Jurisdiction

The date of the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit was April 4, 1977, which was also the date of entry. A timely petition for rehearing en banc was denied on May 27, 1977. This Court's jurisdiction is invoked under Title 28, United States Code, Section 1254(1).

Questions Presented

1. Whether the defendant's right to testify was improperly chilled by a ruling that a twenty-two year old homicide conviction could be used to impeach him.

2. Whether a declaration evincing the defendant's innocent state of mind was improperly held to be inadmissible hearsay.

3. Whether the defendant's right to confrontation was denied by excluding business records that might have shown a vital portion of the testimony of the chief prosecution witness to be false.

4. Whether the defendant was unfairly prejudiced and denied due process by the admission of evidence of a prior similar act.

Constitutional and Statutory Provisions Involved in the Case

1. United States Constitution, Amendment V: . . . [N]or shall any person . . . be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.

2. United States Constitution, Amendment VI: In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor . . . .

3. Federal Rules of Evidence, Rules 609(a); 801(c); 803(3) and 803(6). See Appendix pp. 5a-6a.

Statement of the Case

The petitioner Matthew Madonna was tried in the Southern District of New York before the Hon. Robert L. Carter and a jury and was convicted on one count of possession of heroin with intent to distribute it and one count of conspiracy to possess and to import heroin, in violation of 21 U.S.C. §§ 841(a)(1) and 952(a). He was sentenced to the maximum term of fifteen years on each count, the terms to run consecutively.

No testimony or other evidence directly implicated Madonna. Everything turned on whether a car that he had rented in a false name was used with his knowledge for the purpose of transporting heroin. A friend of Madonna's, the co-defendant Larca, had loaned the car to one Boriello who had picked up heroin and put it in the trunk of the car. Boriello was then arrested and later, under the control of the authorities, he drove the car to a street corner in Manhattan where Larca and Madonna met him and took charge of the car. At this point Larca and Madonna were arrested.

Whether Madonna had prompted Larca to lend the car to Boriello and why Madonna was at the Manhattan rendezvous to take back the car were thus the crucial, indeed the only issues in the case as to Madonna. Boriello, the principal witness for the prosecution, strongly implicated Larca but offered absolutely no testimony inculpatory of of Madonna. Nor did any other participant in the venture implicate Madonna. Thus the only case against Madonna consisted of inferences from the use of the car and some tenuous and dubious allegations of earlier similar acts, see infra pp. 15-16. Draped in this thin skein of circumstantial suspicion, it was crucial for Madonna that he present to the jury the fullest and most compelling version of his defense. But this he was not allowed to do.

The nature of the defense was that he had rented the car in a false name because he was conducting a clandestine extra-marital affair and the car was for the use of his girl-friend who was flying in from Florida. Witnesses, quite unconnected with the petitioner, testified that Madonna did have a girl-friend with whom he maintained an apartment in Florida. But the testimony that might have proved most convincing, that of Madonna himself, was shut out by the court's ruling that, if he took the stand, he could be impeached by evidence of a prior conviction.

This conviction (originally for murder but later reduced to manslaughter) had been returned twenty-two years earlier, when Madonna was eighteen. At the time of the narcotics trial it was almost nine years since he had been released from prison on the earlier conviction. A pre-trial motion was made by the petitioner that the conviction should not be admitted to impeach him if he should testify. The government did not respond to the motion and the court held no hearing but, nevertheless, denied the motion before the government's case concluded. In the face of this ruling Madonna elected not to testify.

Barred from the stand by this threat of impeachment, Madonna endeavored to show through other witnesses that he had no part in the loan of the rented car to Boriello and that he had no knowledge of any heroin transaction. Two witnesses made a proffer that they had heard Madonna shouting to his co-defendant Larca in an angry manner:

> "How could you lend somebody I don't even know my car?"

This declaration was not offered to show the truth of the assertion contained in it but as circumstantial evidence of Madonna's state of mind. But the trial court held it inadmissible.

While the right arm of the defense was thus amputated, the trial court's rulings improperly sheltered the chief prosecution witness, Boriello. Though Boriello did not inculpate Madonna at all, he did heavily implicate the co-defendant Larca. Madonna could not conceivably have been connected with the charges but for his friendship with Larca, so that discrediting Boriello would have greatly aided Madonna's defense. Boriello's testimony described three trips he had made to Thailand in search of heroin, alleging Larca to be the instigator or financier in each case. But the defense introduced business records of a methadone clinic in New York that showed that Boriello was receiving treatment at the clinic on the dates when he testified he was making the first trip to Thailand. The court received the records in evidence, but, before they were submitted to the jury, summarily reversed the ruling after an ex parte conference with certain members of the clinic staff who did not include the person who had made the record entries in question. A request by the defense for an opportunity to summon the person who made the entries for a voir dire was rejected by the court as being likely to cause undue delay.

Gagged as to his defense and with the chief prosecution witness shielded from attack, Madonna was also exposed to the prejudicial impact of prior similar act evidence, which, for all its gauzy texture and too-good-to-be-true quality, was likely enough to tilt the balance. Over objections by the defense expressed in a timely motion, the court admitted the evidence of one Visceglie, a professional criminal who at the time of his testimony was sharing a cell with Boriello, the chief government witness. Visceglie testified that four and a half years earlier he had had some preliminary negotiations with Larca and Madonna about the sale of heroin. But he also testified that when he once spoke to Madonna about a narcotics deal Madonna said "I'm not in that business". In summation to the jury the prosecutor blandly misquoted this testimony and suggested that Madonna said "I'm not in that business any more". The court's only response to a defense objection was to say "All right".

In all instances timely defense motions or objections were made to the trial court. On appeal to the Second Circuit Court of Appeals the main grounds advanced were: (1) the preclusion of the petitioner from testifying by the impeachment ruling; (2) the exclusion of testimony as to the petitioner's angry declaration; (3) the sheltering of Boriello from impeachment by withholding the clinic's business records from the jury; (4) the admission of the evidence of an alleged prior similar act; (5) other areas of prejudice. All these issues were fully briefed. A panel of the Court of Appeals, consisting of Judge Van Graafeiland and District Judges Mishler and Pollack, sitting by designation, affirmed the conviction from the bench, rendering no opinion but delivering the statement that appears in the appendix hereto at pp. 1a-4a.

Reasons for Granting the Writ

This case presents the most compelling of reasons for granting the writ. After a trial in which the court acceded to all government requests and peremptorily dismissed all defense motions, the Court of Appeals was presented with a record and briefs demonstrating grave errors touching basic constitutional rights. The appeal raised very important questions about the Federal Rules of Evidence on which the rulings at the trial were almost plainly wrong. In such a case, and where the defendant had been sentenced to thirty years in prison, the Court of Appeals astonishingly affirmed from the bench and did not write a considered and full opinion. This unfortunate action discredits our system of criminal justice and brings the petitioner to this Court requesting in effect his first review of a conviction that cannot survive serious scrutiny.

I.

The Decision Below Violates Due Process as Elucidated by This Court and Conflicts With Decisions of Other Courts of Appeals as to the Proper Interpretation of Rule 609(a), Federal Rules of Evidence.

The petitioner was precluded from testifying by the court's ruling that a homicide conviction, twenty-two years earlier, could be used to impeach him. Under Rule 609(a), Fed. R. Ev. (App. p. 5a) such a conviction is only admissible to impeach if the court determines that "the probative value of admitting [it] outweighs its prejudicial effect to the defendant". There is ample authority that homicide convictions should not generally be admitted to impeach, especially so stale a one as this. Inter alia, see the observation by Judge (now Chief Justice) Burger in Gordon v. United States, 383 F.2d 936, 940 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 1020 (1967), that acts of violence "generally have little or no direct bearing on honesty and veracity".

If this were so in 1967, it is even more plainly now the case for the Federal Rules of Evidence are clearly understood to have shifted the burden of proof to the government with respect to the test under Rule 609(a). 3 Weinstein, Evidence 609-67 (1976). But in the present case the only information properly before the judge as to the previous conviction was contained in the defendant's pre-trial motion papers on the point. Those papers simply and accurately described the offense as a murder conviction later reduced to manslaughter by a coram nobis proceeding in New York State. The government did not respond to this motion and the court called for no more information. The only source to which the judge could conceivably have looked for details on the previous conviction was a series of remarks made by the prosecutor at pre-trial bail hearings conducted before another judge, the minutes of which may have been examined by the trial judge. But those remarks were tendentious characterizations unsupported by any evidence and would have been strongly challenged by the defense if the judge had not peremptorily denied the motion without making any proper inquiry.

The statement by the Court of Appeals that there was "no abuse of the trial court's discretion" in view of the "manner in which the previous crime occurred" (App. p. 2a) is thus simply inaccurate. While the Court of Appeals may have been correct in stating that an evidentiary hearing is not always necessary in such cases, its decision, on the facts of this case, amounts to holding that an uninformed ruling that an ancient homicide conviction may be admitted to impeach a defendant is an unreviewable exercise of a trial court's discretion. This holding which is in conflict with other circuits (see infra) no doubt stemmed from a misunderstanding of the record by the Court of Appeals. Any such misunderstanding was not the fault of the petitioner. All matters stated here were fully and clearly set forth and argued in the Appendix presented to the Court of Appeals and in the petitioner's main and reply briefs in that court. But the unseemly haste with which the Court of Appeals rushed to judgment may not have afforded it sufficient time to peruse the record and the briefs adequately. This may be evidenced further by the curious remark in the statement delivered by the Court of Appeals that "the defendant did not press for a decision on his motion to preclude" (App. p. 2a). The petitioner filed a formal motion on papers with a supporting memorandum and the trial court denied it before the government's case concluded. It is hard to imagine what more the petitioner should have done.

The holding of the Court of Appeals is in conflict with decisions from other circuits. In United States v. Mahone, 537 F.2d 922, 928-929 (7th Cir. 1976), the trial court had announced that he would permit the impeachment of the defendant "on the basis of the record now before [the court]". In reviewing this disposition the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals held that the language of the court below implicitly indicated that it had weighed the prejudicial effect against the probative value. The court went on:

> In the future, to avoid the unnecessary raising of the issue of whether the judge has meaningfully invoked his discretion under Rule 609, we urge trial judges to make such determinations after a hearing on the record, as the trial judge did in the instant case, and to explicitly find that the prejudicial effect of the evidence to the defendant will be outweighed by its pro-> bative value. . . . Bearing in mind that Rule 609 places the burden of proof on the government . . . the judge should require a brief recital by the government of the circumstances surrounding the admission of the evidence, and a statement of the date, nature and place of the conviction. The defendant should be permitted to rebut the government's presentation pointing out to the court the possible prejudicial effect to the defendant if the evidence is admitted. (Emphasis added). Id.

In United States v. Smith, 551 F.2d 348 (D.C. Cir., 1976), the court reversed, and, in light of the other reasons for its decision, said that it need not assess the independent significance of the lack of an explicit finding that probative value outweighed the prejudice to the defendant. But the court went on to say:

> However, it must be obvious to any careful trial judge that an explicit finding in the terms of the Rule can be of great utility, if indeed not required on appellate review. 551 F.2d at 357.

The affirmance from the bench in the instant case thus appears to be contrary to the holding in Mahone and the dicta in Smith.

The holding below is also in principled conflict with decisions of this Court that have in recent years spoken of the defendant's right to testify as being part of the concept of due process. Morrissey v. Brewer, 408 U.S. 471, 489 (1972); Brooks v. Tennessee, 406 U.S. 605, 613 (1972); Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806, 819 n.15 (1975). In Brooks v. Tennessee, supra, this Court invalidated a Tennessee statute requiring a defendant to testify as the first defense witness or not at all. Effectively barring the defendant from the stand by menacing him with the threat of revealing to the jury that he was convicted of a crime of violence when a young man many years ago is a similar impermissible restriction on his right to testify.

Finally, the decision below on this point is in conflict with the principle expressed in Dorszynski v. United States, 418 U.S. 424 (1974), to the effect that, where a statute requires a "finding" as a predicate to certain action being taken against a defendant, such finding must be made expressly on the record and cannot be implied from the naked ruling or disposition. Federal Rule 609(a) requires a determination that probative value outweighs prejudice. Here the trial court expressed no such determination but baldly denied the petitioner's motion in the one word "Denied". The facts of this case demonstrate dramatically the grave impropriety of such a procedure.

II.

The Exclusion of the Angry Declaration Denied the Petitioner the Right to Call Witnesses in His Favor.

Madonna's overheard out of court declaration, uttered in an angry manner and indicating his surprise and displeasure that Larca had loaned his car to someone Madonna did not know, was offered by the defense as circumstantial evidence that Madonna had an innocent mind at the time of the declaration and, by inference, had no guilty intent when a few hours later he went to retrieve his car. But the trial court excluded it as inadmissible hearsay. This was error and is in conflict with the principles expressed in decisions of this Court and other courts of appeals.

In Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284, 302 (1973), this Court stated that the hearsay rule "may not be applied mechanistically to defeat the ends of justice" where "constitutional rights directly affecting the ascertainment of guilt are implicated". The present case is exactly such a one for the ruling, in combination with the impeachment holding, simply denied the defendant the opportunity to present an effective defense.

Nor was this a case where the hearsay rule would have to be substantially bent to accommodate the principles of the sixth amendment. Even apart from constitutional considerations the declaration should have been admitted. Rule 801(c), Federal Rules of Evidence. (App. p. 5a.) The best view is that it was not hearsay at all, for no matters of fact contained in the statement were in issue. The government itself had sought to prove that Madonna had rented the car and that Larca lent it to Boriello and the defense did not challenge these facts. That Madonna did not know Boriello was hardly in dispute, for all that Boriello claimed was that he had once seen Madonna for one minute in Larca's house and perhaps might have met him once twenty years earlier.

The statement was not introduced to prove or disprove any of these matters of fact (which were not in issue), but only to show that after Larca lent the car to Boriello Madonna was in an angry frame of mind consistent with innocence and the nature of his defense. This is not hearsay or, if classified as hearsay, should routinely be admitted under the state-of-mind exception to the hearsay rule, now substantially codified in Rule 803(3) of the Federal Rules of Evidence. App. p. 5a. This was the holding of the Third Circuit Court of Appeals in Nuttall v. Reading Co., 235 F.2d 546 (3d Cir. 1956), where testimony as to an angry telephone conversation was admitted to show that the declarant acted thereafter in submission to force.

The trial judge was quite bemused by this question, stating that it constituted "a gray area" with which he was not "entirely familiar". No doubt due to its summary procedure, the Court of Appeals appears to have been hardly more sophisticated in its apprehension of the issues. The statement by the Court of Appeals (App. pp. 2a-3a) shows that it viewed the question through the time-worn lens of the Hillmon-Shepard[1] controversy, which petitioner's brief had demonstrated was scarcely relevant. For Hillmon had to do with a declaration admitted to show that a future act had been done, and Shepard was a case where the prime thrust of admitting the declaration was to show the doing of acts in the past. The present case, where the declaration was proffered only as circumstantial evidence of the petitioner's innocent state of mind, is outside the ambit of that controversy.

The combined effect of the impeachment ruling and the hearsay ruling was to force the petitioner to present a thin and attenuated defense the heart of which had been torn away. The impact of these rulings was both impolitic and unfair, amounting to a violation of the fifth amendment due process right and the sixth amendment right to present favorable testimony.

III.

The Exclusion of the Clinic's Business Records Violated the Petitioner's Right to Confrontation.

The Court of Appeals appears to have concluded (App. p. 3a) that the exclusion of the clinic's records, (that might have shown the chief government witness to be in New York when he testified he was in Thailand planning the crime), was justified because there was evidence before the court that the records were untrustworthy. Rule 803 (6), Federal Rules of Evidence. (App. p. 6a). This observation again must rest on unfamiliarity with the trial record on the part of the Court of Appeals.

The clinic's records had initially been routinely admitted into evidence by the court. In an ex parte conference later conducted by the judge with members of the clinic staff, (and possibly a government investigator), it was suggested to the judge that the records were unreliable. The judge then summoned the defendants and counsel to the robing room and announced that he would now exclude the records. Strenuous objections by the defense, who pointed out that the official who had made the record entries was not present and who requested the opportunity to call and examine him, were overruled on the ground that the court would not delay the trial. The defense was thus denied any opportunity to establish the trustworthiness of the records in an adversary proceeding.

The observation by the Court of Appeals that the defense did not object is quite misconceived. The failure to object, if it can properly be so characterized, went only to the initial ex parte conference. When the judge announced his reversal of the admission of the records the minutes show that the defense objected vehemently. The point was, indeed, pressed again by the defense in post-verdict motions supported by further affidavits showing the records to be reliable.

This curtailment of confrontation violated the principle expressed in a line of cases in this Court, exemplified by Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974). As in Davis the prosecution witness here was a crucial one.

IV.

The Admission of Evidence of a Prior Similar Act, Coupled With Improper Prosecutorial Comment, Violated Due Process and Conflicted With Decisions of Another Court of Appeals.

This Court has never fully reviewed nor even commented substantially on the proper scope of the admissibility of allegations of prior criminal conduct by a defendant. Lacking guidance from this Court, the admission of such evidence in the circuit courts of appeals is marked by considerable diversity, with the Second Circuit Court of Appeals probably authorizing admission on a more generous basis than any other circuit.

The Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit has held that, to be admissible, the similar act must be "reasonably close in time to the charge at trial", United States v. Clemons, 503 F.2d 486, 489 (8th Cir. 1974), and that the evidence of the similar act must be "clear and convincing". United States v. Conley, 523 F.2d 650, 653-54 (8th Cir. 1975). But in the present case the evidence related to an alleged incident that took place over four years before the trial. It was offered by a professional criminal who was incarcerated in the same cell as the chief government witness and who had everything to gain by concocting a pleasing story for the authorities. Furthermore, the evidence he gave did not allege any completed transaction but referred only to negotiations that were never consummated.

The admission of such tenuous and easily fabricated testimony from so muddied a source is an unfair practice that violates due process. On the facts of this case the unfairness was scored deeper when the prosecutor in his summation flatly misquoted the witness's exculpatory remark, to the effect that Madonna had told him he was not in the narcotics business, by making it appear that Madonna had said he was not in the business "any more". Despite objections from the defense the court did not correct this deadly inversion nor admonish the prosecutor.

V.

The Court of Appeals Departed From the Accepted and Usual Course of Judicial Proceedings.

One may sympathize with courts who, under the pressure of business, resort more and more to summary affirmances or affirmances from the bench, supported by brief statements sheltered from criticism by not ranking as opinions to be published. But in criminal cases, and especially a case where the outcome for the defendant was so terrible, the practice is fraught with danger. The A.B.A. Standards Relating to Appellate Courts, § 3.36 (Tentative Draft, 1976) state:

> A full opinion reciting the facts, the questions presented, and analysis of pertinent authorities and principles, should be rendered in cases involving new or unsettled questions of general importance.

How sharply and sadly the present case exhibits the wisdom of that observation. When the defendant was sentenced to thirty years in prison, when there were the most substantial issues on appeal, when other circuits have reached contrary conclusions, then affirmance from the bench was a departure from usual procedures within the meaning of this Court's Rule 19(1)(b).

In another case, Arlinghaus v. Ritenour, 543 F.2d 461, 464 (2d Cir. 1976), the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit observed:

> A decisionmaker obliged to give reasons to support his decisions may find they do not; "the opinion will not write".

If the panel of the Court of Appeals in the present case had heeded that sensible observation, the petitioner would not now have to come to this Court to seek relief from the miscarriage of justice below.

CONCLUSION

For these reasons a writ of certiorari should issue to review the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT

Docket #77-1001

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Plaintiff-Appellee,

—v—

MATTHEW MADONNA, a/k/a PAUL DEROBERTIS, SALVATORE LARCA, JOSEPH BORIELLO, JOSEPH FLORIO, RICHARD KLINGER,

Defendants,

MATTHEW MADONNA, a/k/a PAUL DEROBERTIS, SALVATORE LARCA,

Defendants-Appellants.

Before:

New York, New York
April 4, 1977

* Chief Judge, Eastern District of New York.

 Southern District of New York, sitting by designation.

Statement made by the Court at disposition of appeal in open court.

JUDGE VAN GRAAFEILAND:

Counsel, as you know we read the briefs in advance, and we've listened very carefully to the arguments, which were excellent. We're prepared to make our ruling from the bench, and we're going to affirm the conviction. There were several questions raised that I'll comment on just briefly.

Testimony as to the prior conviction meets the requirement of imprisonment in excess of one year and release from prison within ten years under Rule 609. The question was therefore for the Court in the exercise of its discretion as to whether the probative value of the testimony outweighed its prejudicial effect on the defendant. In view of the serious nature of the crime involved and the manner in which it occurred, we see no abuse of the trial court's discretion. There is no requirement in the rules that the trial court must hold an evidentiary hearing whenever the issue of the admissibility of a prior conviction is raised. Since we find no abuse of discretion herein, we need not pass upon the Government's contention that the argument raised by appellant is academic, lacking any indication on defendant's part that he intended to take the stand, or what the nature of his testimony would be. We do note, however, that defendant did not press for a decision on his motion to preclude and that the question raised might therefore well have been academic.

With regard to the statements of Madonna to Larca concerning his automobile, the testimony of Larca and Battista as to Madonna's alleged statement to Larca concerning his car was properly excluded in the discretion of the trial court. If the inference which the defendant wished the jury to draw from this testimony was that Madonna was simply going to the rendezvous to recover his car, or that he had not rented the car for the purpose of lending it to Boriello, then the statement was hearsay. If the statement was not offered for this purpose, it had no probative value. We do not feel that this alleged statement comes within the provisions of Rule 803(3) because it did not deal with the defendant's then existing mental, emotional or physical condition. It was, in fact, a statement of memory of a past event.

With regard to the admission of Visceglia's testimony, it is the settled rule of this court that evidence of prior offenses is admissible, unless offered only for the purpose of showing defendant's criminal character, or unless its potential for prejudicing the defendant outweighs its probative value. The testimony as to Madonna's and Larca's previous joint participation in the proposed sale of narcotics was admissible for the purpose of showing the intention of the parties in the instant case, within the exercise of the District Court's broad discretion.

With regard to the Einstein Hospital records, because there was substantial evidence before the District Court that the copies of the hospital records indicated a lack of trustworthiness within the meaning of Rule 803(8) of the Federal Rules of Evidence, the Court was justified in the exercise of its discretion in excluding them. We conclude from reading the record that the Court's reference to D.E.A. agent Meale at page 1844 was, in actuality, intended as a reference to Mr. Marion who was requested in the same statement to put his remarks on the record. In affirming with regard to this point, we do not intend to indicate our approval of the procedure followed by the District Judge in conferring with the witnesses in chamber in the absence of counsel; but it appears from the record that no objection was made by counsel to this procedure.

With regard to the Portman-Klinger tapes, concerning which no argument was made in court this morning, probably for lack of time, in view of Klinger's statements that he did not know the parties involved and intended the "Godfather" references only as a joke, and the District Court's careful limiting instructions, we do not find that the admission of this taped conversation constituted prejudicial and reversible error.

We find all other allegations of error to be without substance and we therefore affirm.

Statutes and Rules Involved

Federal Rules of Evidence

Rule 609(a)

> For the purpose of attacking the credibility of a witness, evidence that he has been convicted of a crime shall be admitted if elicited from him or established by public record during cross-examination but only if the crime (1) was punishable by death or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law under which he was convicted, and the court determines that the probative value of admitting this evidence outweighs its prejudicial effect to the defendant, or (2) involved dishonesty or false statement, regardless of the punishment.

Rule 801(c)

> "Hearsay" is a statement, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at the trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted.

Rule 803(3) and 803(6)

> The following are not excluded by the hearsay rule, even though the declarant is available as a witness:
> (3) Then existing mental, emotional, or physical condition. A statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition (such as intent, plan, motive, design, mental feeling, pain and bodily health), but not including a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed unless it relates to the execution, revocation, identification or terms of declarant's will.

(6) Records of regularly conducted activity.—A memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, in any form, of acts, events, conditions, opinions, or diagnoses, made at or near the time by, or from information transmitted by, a person with knowledge, if kept in the course of a regularly conducted business activity, and if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make the memorandum, report, record, or data compilation, all as shown by the testimony of the custodian or other qualified witness, unless the source of information or the method or circumstances of preparation indicate lack of trustworthiness. The term "business" as used in this paragraph includes business, institution, association, profession, occupation, and calling of every kind, whether or not conducted for profit.
